WATER AND SOIL BIODIVERSITY

The state of the world reported in a number of UN documents (Korten, 1987; World Commission on Environment and Development, 1987; World Bank, 1989; World Commission on Dams, 1991; World Commission on Water, 1992) has been and still has a profound effect on the participation of women in water projects. The World Commission on Water (1992) has a very pertinent statement on water and women:

...community as a whole. It is important to recognize that a woman's capacity to take part in water management activities is not only a function of her own knowledge and skills, but also of the social and economic conditions of her life. In a world where the needs and interests of the poor have been largely ignored and where the state has been unable to provide basic services, it is not surprising that women have been excluded from water management activities.

Before, women got off the top, everything went into some kind of one-size-fits-all solution. It was a kind of a universal solution, but it was not a solution at all. It was a solution for the rich, for the powerful, for the men.
